But does that give the writers complete card blanche to strip away decades of history just for the sake of a dollar? Think about the creative energy it took to build the live that these fictional character have. If I were the creator of such fictional histories I would want to sue for copywrite infringement regardless of the fact that the studio had to buy said copywrite. I understand some of the changes that are made because science has advanced since some of those characters were created. But come on, putting a character in a story that should have only been a baby when wolverine got the adamantium. That is just down write wrong.
