I really think Marvel Dropped the ball on this one. With their 50 States Initiative they resorted to generic Superheroes or regional Stereotypes, in the manner that they depict Heroes of other countries.

What they should have done is ask "True Believers" for suggestions about powers and traits seem relavent or useful for superheroics in their home state. THis would be an easy and fruitful task through forums, emails, Social Networking or Twitter. Not that I ever heard of these being applied.

So how about we do it instead? Here's the rules: Name a state you feel very familiar with, and compose a team for that state comprised of characters dedicated to its various aspects. They don't have to be OCs or any form of canon. Just compile as many as 7 characters you think would make a fine fit for your home state or territory, or any state or territory you have called home in the past.

Their Superhero names, and powers and team positions are mandatory. Other material, like personal background, politics, character, relationships, etc. are optional.

Another thing. In Secret Invasion, it was revealed that there was a Skrull on every one of the teams. You may choose to out which member is the actual Skrull.

ANd allies who are not or can not be on the team may be counted as extras, but you must state why they are not one the team.
