What I meant by "I know the approach that this person took was civil but there is another way to approach that.?: A PM would've sufficed in informing me that you feel that I was violating some HM rule, I would've then contacted a mod myself to be sure of it. IF a mod felt that you were correct, then I would've had no qualms in removing the piece. Instead, there was a comment to the work for all to see. It wasn't necessary to publically denounce the work in question and make me look bad.

I'm one of the few that have been around before Heromorph was even Heromorph. I know the rules. It isn't necessary to explain them to me. IF I could've given credit to the original artist, I would have AND I was actively seeking this person out and asking for help in doing so. So it's not like I was taking it and claiming that I created the whole thing.

Admittedly, there exists a fine line between following and breaking the rules... but I don't feel I've crossed that line. IF ANY MODS DISAGREE, NOTIFY ME BY PM AND REMOVE THE PIECE IN QUESTION. I'm fine with that.

NOW...

In no way will I be attempting to make this next comment anything less than it is, which would be a personal opinion that may come off as an attack when it is simply an statement made from observation(if we remember correctly, something like this has happened before from Chilly himself)...

Should he decide to leave HM permanently, I for one will not miss him, because frankly, I think he's somewhat condesending and arrogant... and not in a fun way. He is a fairly good artist and I did enjoy seeing his works, but that in no way changes my opinion, which may be a bit biased on account of this bit of drama.

Okay, maybe it was wrong for me to say that, but at least I didn't say it in the way I really wanted to.
